

As we all know, the month of March celebrates women in history. It's a time to remember all the important women such as inventors and activists and the significant things they did for the country. It's also time to remember the big changes as a result of their hard work, dedication, and accomplishments.

We celebrate so many women and they all deserve recognition. But one particular one who is admirable is Rosa Parks. Rosa Parks is known and admired for her role in the Civil Rights Movement, which she took part in when she was young. She faced a lot of discrimination because of her race growing up in Alabama.

One well-known thing Rosa did that led to huge change happened on a public bus. She refused to give up her bus seat in the front to a white person when asked to move.

Because of her refusal to give up her bus seat, Rosa ended up getting arrested. As a result of her arrest, the Montgomery Bus Boycott started. Although she lost her job because she took part in the boycott, the result of this was successful and created positive change. The boycott lasted for over 300 days and led to the Supreme Court's decision that segregation is unconstitutional.

She stood her ground when it came to situations like this and helped to end racial segregation. Rosa fought to stop racial injustice and took part in social justice organizations in Montgomery, Alabama. She inspired other African-Americans to take action and help put an end to racial segregation.

Rosa relocated from Alabama to other parts of the country with her husband. She still continued to be heavily involved in the fight against inequality through organizations.

Rosa was unstoppable when it came to what was important to her. Her dedication to fight for equality will always be remembered by many. We'll never forget everything she did and her contributions to change in America. The awards she received and being on Time Magazine's list named "The 20 Most Influential People of the 20th Century." shows just how true this is.
